

Weekly Wild Wednesday

For October 7th, 2020

Hi everyone, what a fun week! So beautiful, this feels like the prettiest Fall Foliage ever. I am taking the time to really look at the color on both hikes and drives. I learned from several podcasts and zoom webinars, many this week about Fall NON-clean up education --and 2 design webinars.

This photo was from the Graham Herbst webinar, library link shared by Dianne.

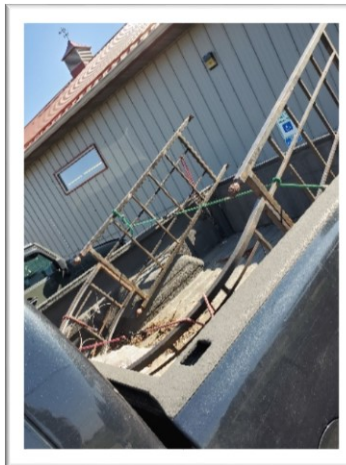

At The Flower House Mercedes and I laid out cardboard over the lawn spaces that are currently winterizing to prepare for Spring planting. We laid out hose in the shape she preferred, filled in with cardboard, and covered with the mulch she likes called "Soil Pep" from Mountain West. There are sources for you-haul non-cost and non-impact mulches for sites in which there is not a preference of materials, and I am pursuing one of those this week as well for sustainable options.

Here are some photos from the side of The Flower House. The newly planted vine is still doing well in its new home!

We also found a trellis at Second Hand Finds, and brought it to frame the back gate at The Flower House. It fits perfectly and is nearly the exact width of that back gate. I think it will be really pretty when covered with the wild Grape Vines that will grow along that back yard fence line.

Yanney Garden: Buddy and I went to Mulhalls in Omaha to get a requested family plant for Charese's Garden-- and also a few Native plants, non-cultivar. They had masses of 'native' cultivars. Doug Tallamy has some interesting research about cultivars.

.Wishing you all the best coming week ever, and I hope you get to enjoy both the Fall weather
--and the gorgeous colors!
